1.

- In 1936, psychologist Kurt Lewin divided the world's social cultures into two types.
- _____ (5) cultures tend to be soft and friendly on the surface, even with strangers, but have a hard protective inner core.
- _____ (7) cultures present a tough shell to the world, resisting closeness and small talk, but reward patience with a softness within.
- Both types are named after the fruits whose physical structure mirrors these social architectures exactly.
- What is the model called?

- At the Miami Art Museum, an interactive installation reimagines an indoor Olympic sport, where it's net is replaced by a body of water. Players are warned not to reach in to retrieve balls that fall in, and not to continue playing with a wet ball if one does.
- What is the punny, onomatopoeic title of this installation?

3.

- In 1859, the Lyon chemist François-Emmanuel Verguin patented an aniline dye and named it after a flower [X]. This pendulous flower, discovered in the 1700s in Central and South America, was named after a German botanist, Leonard ____.
- Later that same year, Napoleon III's French forces beat the Austrians in the Battle of [Y]. Verguin's employer hastily renamed the dye after the town in Lombardy, where the battle was fought.
- Both names survived. [Y] dominated the 20th century and became a standard printing ink. [X] became trendy around the 2000s. Not to blush, but the dye featured significantly in a recent global event.
- Give [X] and [Y] essentially the same color.

- When the Germans started using chlorine gas in WW1, the Allied soldiers found themselves in a dire situation. Knowing that ammonia could neutralize chlorine, they resorted to breathing through rags soaked in something, out of desperation.
- What naturally occurring elixir, did they soak the rags into?
- Soon, the Allied scientists experimented with materials that could trap poison gases. They discovered that the remnant of a common ingredient, when burnt, created a dense porous structure, which trapped the gas molecules before they reached the lungs.
- What commercial food item? The resulting product is a popular ingredient in the cosmetic industry.

- Surendra Mohan Bose was an Indian scientist who was imprisoned during WW1. While in jail, Bose came across accounts of Indian soldiers operating in difficult weather conditions, while imported products of this type remained expensive and largely inaccessible to ordinary Indians.
- His breakthrough came from an unlikely source, ducks. He observed how water effortlessly rolled off the duck's feathers because of the natural oils covering them and started a brand on this unique waterproof technique.
- Name the eponymous brand? (nostalgic to a few)

The phrase "like water off a duck's back" inspired the brand name

- Through the 1700s, the dominant coin in the Atlantic world was the Spanish silver dollar, written in ledgers as pesos. Clerks abbreviated it "PS".
- In fast handwriting, the s got written small and raised above the P - P^s. Over time, the two letters collapsed into each other and the loop of the P dropped away.
- This led to current day version of which symbol?

- This was originally used for visual-spatial measurements while driving. It was also a way to differentiate between different manufacturers.
- The luxury manufacturers transformed it from a vestigial to an aesthetic accessory, reflective of their brand identity. Despite the advent of sensors and other technology, this feature still remains in demand.
- In India, the government has repurposed this feature to project its commanding presence.
- What feature? How has the govt. repurposed it into?

- On 22 November 1950, the Fort Wayne Pistons beat the Minneapolis Lakers 19–18 (the lowest-scoring game in NBA history) by simply holding the ball and refusing to shoot. Attendance was spiraling.
- Danny Biasone, who owned the Syracuse Nationals (now Philadelphia 76ers), reckoned a watchable game contained about 120 field-goal attempts across 48 minutes. He did the maths and found a number. The league adopted his answer for the 1954–55 season and scoring rose by roughly fourteen points a game in a single year.
- What did Biasone's number give the sport?

safety slide

- According to Aristotle, the brain was merely a cooling radiator for the blood while the true seat of memory & intelligence lay in a different yet more important organ.
- His theory dominated European thought well into the Middle Ages, which is why medieval students committing texts to memory believed they were filing them in an organ that had nothing to do with it.
- Which phrase, still used in schools, is a remnant of this misconception?

- Introduced in the Victorian era, this physical feature was present in the flagship products of the Big Four, helping people navigate their contents rather than fully peruse them. From the 20th century, as these products moved online, the feature became almost obsolete.
- In 2025, in its first revision in 22 years, one of the Big 4 (the only American one) insisted on retaining the obsolete physical feature purely out of nostalgia. The only US machine capable of doing them had shut down since it was last needed, so the work had to go to India.

- In post-WWII Soviet Russia, Stalin's government banned Western music, leaving fans desperate for alternatives. With this restriction and vinyl unobtainable, a sound engineer named Ruslan Bogoslovsky built a copy of a recording lathe and started pressing bootlegs onto the flexible plastic sheets available in bulk for free from hospital waste. The results were single-sided, played at 78 rpm, wore out after a few dozen plays, and had their spindle holes burned through with a lit cigarette.
- They carried jazz, rock and roll, tango and were sold hand to hand at flea markets. Over a million records were circulated.
- Because of what they were cut on, buyers could see ribs, skulls and shattered pelvises through the grooves, which gave the records their popular name.

- A blazar is a supermassive black hole shooting out a jet of plasma at almost light speed. One of them, PKS 1424+240, was among the brightest gamma-ray and neutrino sources in the sky, yet its jet seemed to move slowly. After 15 years of research, astronomers at the Max Planck Institute found the jet is aimed almost perfectly at Earth. The slowness is a projection effect and the direct view boosts its apparent brightness.
- The nickname for this blazar comes from a mid-20th-century work of fiction that features a fiery, dangerous watcher whose gaze can only be turned in one direction at a time.
