X is an all-female-fronted football podcast and website with an active and engaging social media presence.

Lynsey Hooper, Kait Borsay and Hayley McQueen head up the podcast, with a 30-strong team of volunteers behind-the-scenes creating and curating content to actively promote female inclusion in all elements of football.

Born out of frustration at the lack of representation of women in the industry, X has been going since 2012 with the aim of creating one space for football, regardless of gender.

X here is a phrase commonly said to be used against female football fans where they are asked to explain X to 'prove' the veracity of their following of the game. Give X

Question 3

Media personality X is known for his outspoken views and controversial comments and they have got him into trouble on more than one occasion. His tweets during the second match of the 2013 Ashes in Adelaide reached a critical mass when he branded England's batsmen 'scaredy cats' as they capitulated against Aussie fast bowler Mitchell Johnson and told them to 'grow a pair'.

In reply, retired Australian bowler Y challenged X to an over of his bowling in the nets. Since he had barely been retired for a year and was still consistently bowling for Big Bash League side Sydney Sixers, Y had not yet lost any of his pace.

Y showed no mercy as four of the six deliveries hit X on the body, leaving him with a broken rib. Sir Richard Hadlee later called the incident "a dangerous and unnecessary stunt". ID X and Y.

Question 5

Four-time Olympic gold medalist sprinter Michael Johnson has been quoted as saying he believes X descendants make superior athletes -- and that such a controversial topic shouldn't be avoided but discussed openly as the world begins to turn its attention to the 2012 London Olympics.

"All my life I believed I became an athlete through my own determination, but it's impossible to think that being descended from X hasn't left an imprint through the generations," he is quoted as saying in an article in the British newspaper the Daily Mail. "Difficult as it was to hear, X has benefited descendants like me -- I believe there is a superior athletic gene in us."

Question 6

X, is a non-contact, cheap and widely accessible team sport developed in 1968. Played in over 100 countries worldwide, X requires all the components of any great sport: a combination of athleticism, skill, and strategy.

It is often regarded as the pinnacle display of sportsmanship. That's because the sport is entirely self-officiated, meaning it has no official referees. As a result, the game demands a high degree of honesty and respect between the players to work properly.

While these are the qualities for an ideal Olympic sport to uphold and promote, many consider X to be a joke and a quasi-sport. ID X.
